

1. Conclusion: A conclusion is the final part of an argument or a piece of writing that sums up the main points and draws a final judgment or inference based on the presented information.
2. Restate argument: Restating an argument involves repeating the main points or ideas from an argument or piece of writing in a clear and concise manner. This is often done to clarify the writer's position or to remind readers of the main points.
3. So what statement: A "so what" statement is a sentence that explains the significance or importance of a particular argument or piece of information. It asks the question "why does this matter?" and helps the writer to connect their argument to a broader context or audience.
4. Active voice: Active voice is a grammatical structure in which the subject of a sentence performs the action of the verb. This makes the sentence more direct, concise, and engaging. For example, "The dog chased the ball."
5. Passive voice: Passive voice is a grammatical structure in which the object of a sentence is the subject of the sentence and the action is performed upon it by the verb. This often makes the sentence less clear, less engaging, and less direct. For example, "The ball was chased by the dog."
